

Faculti Summary

<https://faculti.net/elite-families-and-settler-society-nineteenth-century-ontario/>

Here are some articles that cover similar themes and topics as the video regarding gender, family dynamics, settler colonialism, and socio-economic aspirations in 19th-century Canada:

1. "Rethinking Gender and the Family in the Canadian Settlement Experience" - This article explores how gender roles shaped family structures among settlers in early Canadian history, particularly in the context of colonialism and economic challenges.
2. "The Role of Women in 19th Century Canadian Settler Society" - This piece examines the significant yet often overlooked roles that women played in establishing and maintaining settler communities in Canada, highlighting their contributions to family economy and social dynamics.
3. "Class Formation and Gender Relations in Ontario: A Historical Perspective" - This article analyzes the intersection of class and gender in Ontario during the 19th century, investigating how middle-class formations influenced social relations and community organization.
4. "Settler Colonialism in Canada: Family, Memory, and the Construction of Heritage" - Focusing on how families of settlers constructed narratives around their collective memory and heritage, this work discusses the complexities of identity in the context of colonial legacies.
5. "Households, Maternalism, and the Politics of Gender in the Nineteenth-Century West" - This article delves into the role of maternalism in shaping social policies and family expectations in Canadian pioneer communities, showcasing how women's roles were both influenced by and influencers of socio-political structures.
6. "Commemoration and Public Memory in Ontario's Colonial History" - This work reflects on how public memory and historical sites in Ontario have been used to commemorate colonial history, with specific emphasis on family networks and their influence on community identity.
7. "Material Culture and the Formation of Middle-class Identity in Nineteenth-Century Ontario" - This article investigates how material possessions and domestic spaces were integral to the identity and status aspirations of middle-class families in Ontario during the 1800s.

These articles collectively deepen the understanding of the complex interplay of gender, class, and colonialism in 19th-century Ontario, similar to the themes and narratives found in your video.