In this episode of the Faculty Law Podcast, hosts Lily and David discuss the relevance of colonialism in the modern world, asserting that its impacts are far from being relics of the past. They highlight how colonial legacies shape current social inequalities, using examples like the concentration of quality healthcare in areas historically occupied by colonizers.

The conversation explores three academic approaches to understanding colonialism: the utilitarian view, which controversially weighs colonialism's costs and benefits; the decolonial perspective, which focuses on dismantling colonial legacies; and the analytic philosophy approach, which examines the concept of epistemic injustice—the erasure of the knowledge systems of colonized peoples.

David and Lily emphasize the need for education and awareness to confront the pervasive influence of colonialism, encouraging listeners to engage in meaningful conversations and challenge these issues in their own lives. They conclude with the idea that addressing these matters is essential for creating a just and equitable future, quoting James Baldwin on the importance of confronting challenges to drive change.
