<https://faculti.net/transparency-about-lagging-diversity-numbers-signals-genuine-progress/>

This video discusses the response of companies to the racial reckoning that emerged after George Floyd's death, focusing on their commitments to increase diversity and inclusion in the workforce. It highlights that while many corporations expressed intentions to improve diversity, few have publicly disclosed actual metrics about their workforce demographics. The author argues that companies possess this data, as they are legally required to report it to the EEOC, suggesting that the lack of transparency might stem from strategic calculations about the potential repercussions of disclosure.

The discussion emphasizes that there is a general mistrust among stakeholders regarding organizations' sincerity in their diversity efforts. Transparency is proposed as a means to rebuild trust, encouraging companies to openly report their successes and challenges in achieving diversity goals. The author contends that admitting struggles can enhance a company's reputation, as it demonstrates accountability and a commitment to improvement rather than hiding failures.

Additionally, the text touches on the political tensions surrounding diversity initiatives, suggesting that a clearer and more specific dialogue about diversity and inclusion can help mitigate misunderstandings and resistance. By being transparent about diversity-related efforts and outcomes, organizations may foster more constructive conversations and reduce polarization on the topic. Overall, the text advocates for systematic accountability and ongoing feedback mechanisms in diversity programs.
