This video video discusses the challenges faced by OECD countries related to aging populations and environmental risks. It emphasizes the need for stable economic policies that can address both demographic and environmental pressures. The study explores how economic conditions, population structures, and environmental risks influence savings behavior. It also highlights the impact of natural disasters on savings rates and the implications for long-term economic stability. Suggestions for future research include focusing on regional differences within OECD countries and incorporating foreign direct investments into macroeconomic models to better understand international imbalances and innovation spread across borders.
