This video video discusses a study on how firms prepare for export opportunities, particularly focusing on whether they adjust their workforce by hiring workers with previous experience at exporting firms. The findings suggest that firms do indeed hire such workers in preparation for exports, indicating that this adjustment is important. The study also highlights the potential policy implications, suggesting that restrictions on workers' mobility in the labor market could hinder knowledge transfer and limit firms' ability to compete in foreign markets. The areas for future research include exploring the impact of labor market policies on firms' competitiveness in export markets.
