<https://faculti.net/on-political-misogyny/>

This video video discusses the concept of political misogyny, where women in politics face bias and hatred based on their gender. It highlights the disparity between optimistic findings that suggest gender doesn't play a role in politics and the reality of how women are treated in the political arena. The author emphasizes the need for a more intersectional approach to understanding misogyny, considering factors such as race and sexuality. This video video also delves into how societal views shape attitudes towards women in power and the challenges they face in being perceived as competent and likable. It concludes by discussing how women are often subject to intense scrutiny and criticism compared to their male counterparts.
